Cate Creede

Cate Creede, PhD, is a Partner in The Potential Group consulting firm, which focuses on strategic change in academic healthcare and education. She is a consultant, teacher and researcher, with a mission to create sustainable, generative, socially accountable change. Cate is deeply experienced at design, facilitation, capacity building and constructing effective conversations and processes that support systemic change and social innovation, primarily in healthcare and community agencies. She has supported more than 150 strategic change initiatives in academic and community healthcare across Canada in the past decade.

For the past eight years, Cate has also been the volunteer Co-Director of a children's development project in Kasese, Uganda called Nikibasika Learning and Development Program, which supports a group of 52 orphaned and vulnerable children and youth to become community oriented, globally aware, self-sustaining citizens. She co-leads all fundraising, strategic direction and hands-on management of the program.

In her role as a teacher, Cate is Core Faculty and a founding co-director of the Collaborative Change Leadership program at the Centre for Interprofessional Care, and the Associate Director of the New and Emerging Academic Leaders program at the Centre for Faculty Development, both at the University of Toronto in Toronto, Canada. She also holds an adjunct appointment in the Department of Psychiatry, also at the University of Toronto.
